

Let us expand the wings of dove over

The poisoned political atmosphere which is dominant in the world especially in Middle East and Iran have cast a shadow on the foreign commercial relations of Iran with the EU and Britain and this situation worsen every passing day. For sure, this event will be settled sooner or later and awaited quietness will be established. But since the losses of it will irrecoverably affect the capital, investment, capital owners, foreign trade and consequently two countries' national economy we can't simply ignore it.

Now, without any useless preparation and due to the scientific knowledge, we should accept that in such conditions the chambers of commerce especially joint chambers as executive arms of countries in the process of foreign trade development and growth are responsible for this fateful and historical duty. For the present time, this task is taken with joint chambers of Iran and Britain.

In short, for keeping more and close relationships, exchanging the commercial delegations, mutual visiting of economic centres, investigating effective and potential possibilities we have to underline the foreign trade relations of two countries.

In order to make it worthy the only way is respecting and creating new fields for developing foreign commercial relations of two countries. A relation that has been sound and firm such a long time and no doubt there will be returns furthermore, as said:

Calmness always returns to the sea after the cyclone.

The poisoned and unfavourable atmosphere which is now dominant will definitely settle sooner than expected and the developing plans of the mutual foreign trade will be at the top of the agenda.

Let us expand the wings of dove over.

Editorial